THE DREAM COTTAGE

I WAS still in a bad temper when I came out of the water and flopped down on the beach towel. I hoped a swim would buoy up my spirits, but it only made me unhappier. A young man seated on a mat next to me was eating popcorn and I could hear the crunch of his strong white teeth. Occasionally he tossed a kernel up into the air and I found the gesture most annoying. Hopefully, I looked around the beach but it was just as crowded everywhere.

Snapping off my bathing cap, I threw it on the towel. Then, slowly, I scrunched my feet in the sand to dry them off and laid down to face the sun. The young man was still tossing popcorn in that dreamy way, but I had to admit he was handsome.

The sun was warm and tingling and made me think of all the warm summer days gone by when I was a kid. White fluffy clouds high up in the sky built themselves into sandcastles, and I longed for the dimly remembered pleasure of digging in cold wet sand. "Dreaming again!" I scolded myself objectively. If I had an ounce of brains in my head, now that I was twenty-one, it was time I stopped day dreaming! But ten minutes on a beach made all my resolutions dissolve, and blooey, I'd go dreaming again!

Even now I could still recall the terrible shock I experienced when I learned that my father had sold our summer cottage — the place I had loved most of all. His business had gone bad that year when I was twelve and we had moved to the city permanently. But I had never forgotten.

I remembered its peacefulness . . . the spears of cut-grass like a fringe of hair on the dunes . . . the flat, smooth shore glistening with the wetness of waves . . . the sparkle of sunlight on the water that became a myriad of silver-shining coins in the evening . . . the sad, swirling cry of a passing gull . . . the crackling, smokey fire . . . "franks" roasting in the dusk . . . and the cottage, hushed and sheltered beneath the sighing canopy of tall, dark pines!

I sighed! All of that was gone, perhaps forever. Now there were only the weekends at the beach where you had to search endlessly to find an open patch to spread out your towel. Where sand was kicked in your face and where there was always the danger of a ball hitting you in the stomach or someone accidentally kicking you in the shins. And from somewhere close by would be the noisy baseball game on a radio and everywhere people chomping, sipping and eating. I felt I could scream, but each weekend I would dream of the cottage I vowed I would someday buy like the other I had known. Yet would it ever come true?

"Oh, grow up!" I scolded myself again, brushing the dry sand from my legs.

"Have some popcorn," the young man said, as he offered the box across to me.

I took one. The buttery kernel went into my mouth and with it a generous sprinkling of sand. I realized it all too late as I began to cough.

Leaping to my side, the young man gave me a hearty pat on the back and my coughing stopped immediately.

"All right, now?" he asked.

"Much better," I said, feeling rather ridiculous. "Thank you."

"I'm very sorry," he apologized.

"Oh, but it wasn't the popcorn," I explained. "Some sand must have been on my fingers."

"Then you won't be afraid to take another chance!" he said.

"Not a bit!" I answered, laughing.

"Good," he replied. "There's nothing more lonely than eating popcorn by oneself."

For a while we ate quietly. He was wearing white ducks and a jacket, but his feet were bare and deeply browned as if he came to the beach frequently.

"You swim very well," he remarked at last, eltting me know he had watched me out in the surf.

"I suppose it's because I love it so," I answered. "Sometimes I come with a group of girls, but I prefer coming alone."

"Anti-social, or something?" he asked.

"Oh, no," I replied. "It's just that the beach means more to me than just chatting with the girls and getting a sun tan."

The popcorn had run out and he threw away the box and began putting on his shoes. He laced them studiously. When he had finished, he sat and stared off across the water. I looked, too, past the fringe line of bathers and beyond the foamy on-coming waves. It seemed dreamy and peaceful.

"I guess it's rather special to me, too," he reflected.

We sat a while longer watching some children playing in the waves. Then the young man looked at his watch.

"Oh—oh, I'm going to be late if I don't get a move on," he said.

When he got up I first realized how tall he was. Quickly, he rolled up the slim mat and tucked it under his arm. Ready to leave, he looked down at me and smiled.

"Thank you for sharing the popcorn," he said.

As he walked away, I realized he had never asked for my name, and somehow I wished he had. I would have liked seeing him again, and knowing I wouldn't, gave me a sudden feeling of loneliness.

I looked at the empty area where his mat had been and saw something half buried in the sand. When I pulled it out, I discovered it was his wallet. My spirits soared. Inside the wallet would be some means of identification, and perhaps I would be seeing him again, after all!

But in the next instant I was holding my breath. The wallet contained nothing but hundred dollar bills! Quickly I snatched up my beach bag and using it to conceal the wallet, I began to count the money. It didn't seem possible, but there was nearly three thousand dollars!

My head spun so fast I had to close my eyes. It was like a wish come true! Here in my hands was what I needed to make my dream a reality! There was just enough to make a down payment on the dream cottage that was waiting somewhere for me. I could see it clearly, standing beneath the pines, sheltered from the wind, while from the porch I could look out straight across the beach to the ocean. Then I cut myself short. This was ridiculous! I would have to locate the young man somehow and return his wallet to him.

As I opened my eyes, I saw the young man already standing before me.

"Hi," he said, smiling. "You know, I got clear to the pavilion before it dawned on me that I forgot to ask you for your name!"

Then it wasn't the money that had brought him back, I thought . . . but me! I held out my hand with the wallet.

"I found this in the sand," I said.

"Jumping catfish!" he exclaimed with recognition. "I guess this must be my lucky day."

"You should be more careful," I scolded.

"You're right," he grinned. "It's certainly wonderful for me that I met you or I'd have to tell that real estate agent that I can't buy the house, after all."

"House?" I repeated.

"Well, it's only a small one, but a beauty," he added. "It's on a quiet inlet a few miles from here, with a beautiful view of the ocean."

My heart seemed to do a handspring.

"Now, young lady," he said, "would you mind telling me your name?"

"Sally," I smiled. "And yours?"

"Ken," he replied, laughing.

For a moment we looked at each other and I could see his eyes. They were bright, steady and clear.

"Do you like houses near the ocean?" he asked.

"I adore them," I replied.

"That's wonderful," he began. "Look," he continued, "would you like seeing mine? I was just on my way to meet the agent and you're more than welcome to come along."

"I'd love to," I answered eagerly. "I'll change up at the beachhouse and be ready in no time."

"Good," he replied. And together we rolled up my beach things. My heart was beating happily. Then he slipped his arm in mine and as we walked off, the image of my dream cottage became all the more clear. Somehow I sensed it was coming true and in the most wondrous way imaginable!
